New York, April 5.—By unanimous vote the judges of the annual public speaking contest held at Columbia this afternoon awarded the first prize to Eua Isaacs Seme, an African prince. This is the first time in the history of the Curtis medal competition that a negro student has been selected. Seme's subject was "The Regeneration of Africa," and his oration was delivered with a convincing earnestness that won the audience that filled Korte Hall. By a coincidence, while this Zulu was winning honors in learning over American students, his countrymen were in revolt against Great Britain, the colonial forces being beaten back in an encounter brought about by an attempt to collect a poll tax. Seme is a senator at Columbia and expects to get the degree of bachelor of arts at the close of the college year, when his people will send him to study law at Oxford. When he completes his course he will return to Zululana, where, it is said, a Government appointment awaits him.
